

Focus Europe

Dark clouds, no storm yet

Dark clouds have been gathering since the beginning of the year, but we do not see a storm yet. Europe is dealing with an external demand shock and a deflationary shock. Both threaten inflation, but the latter boosts domestic demand. Hence, external headwinds have not yet been sufficient for us to revise down our central expectation for euro-area growth, but the risks are rising. That said, the inflation outlook has clearly deteriorated.

A modest weakening of the euro area data, tighter financial conditions as well as a more dovish Fed, BoE and BoJ increase the potential for a more aggressive ECB easing. (i) We continue to see a deposit rate cut as a near certainty, but it won't be enough. (ii) Hence, we persist with our call for an increase in the synergies between the negative deposit rate, QE and TLTROs. (iii) Furthermore, we think that data will have to surprise on the upside to avoid a temporary acceleration of the monthly QE purchases.

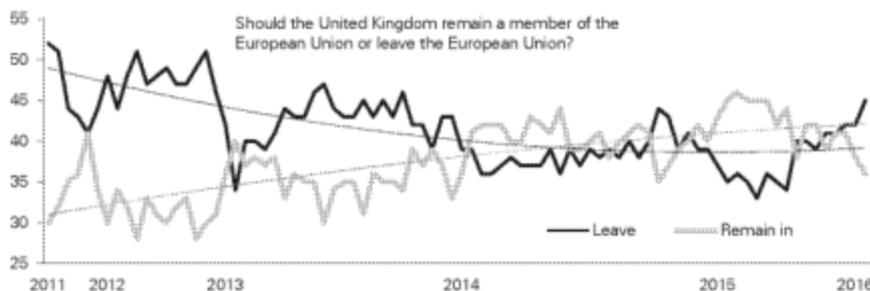

The euro area final January PMIs confirmed the softer flash reading. Despite the monthly decline, all the major activity indices remain consistent with ongoing recovery. The negative news was the slightly larger decline than before in the prices indices, adding to ECB concerns over low inflation. SIREN-Momentum was broadly unchanged this week. SIREN-Surprise remained close to its 15 month low.

The euro area January core HICP inflation print was a positive at the margin, suggesting that some of the loss in momentum at the end of last year may have been due to temporary factors. Still, progress this year is expected to be very slow, and headline inflation may well stay around zero until the summer.

This week's draft UK/EU renegotiation looks set to pave the way for a UK referendum on EU membership in June. We expect the UK to remain in, but polls suggest a non-negligible risk of exit. So far, the EU issue has had little impact on monetary policy, nor should it in our central forecast. Weaker growth and inflation have increased market fears of a near-term easing. But if the BoE's generally optimistic medium-term forecasts prove correct, then the next move is still likely to be a hike.

We also include links to three recent reports: an updated assessment of the possible coalition combinations in Spain; a preview of the coming election in Ireland where another periphery economy is heading for parliamentary fragmentation and possible minority government; and an analysis of the Italian bad banks proposal which while positive is far from being a game-changer.

Risk of Brexit rises – if you believe the polls

Source: YouGov, Deutsche Bank

Research Team

Euroland
Marc de Muizon
marc.de-muizon@db.com
Peter Sidorov
peter.sidorov@db.com
Marco Stringa
marco.stringa@db.com
Mark Wall
mark.wall@db.com
UK/Scandinavia
George Buckley
george.buckley@db.com
Central Europe
Caroline Grady
caroline.grady@db.com
Inflation Strategy/Economics
Markus Heider
markus.heider@db.com

Table of contents

Dark clouds, no storm yet	Page 03
Euro PMIs: softer but still solid start to 2016	Page 09
Spain update: challenging negotiations	Page 12
Ireland General Election 2016 Preview	Page 13
Italy's bad bank(s): not enough, but it helps	Page 14
Euroland inflation	Page 15
UK: Markets still see rate-cut risk	Page 17
UK: Referendum campaign starts here	Page 19
SIREN: Euro-macro surprises remain negative	Page 21
Rate Views	Page 23