and then we relate individual events to that larger stream

you assume we have the same sense. i wonder whether sensory overload is due to a dissonance with inputs and timing. faster clocks would restrict the ability to assimilate

i think that my brain is prone to insufficient signal penetration; perhaps there is a weakness in one of the neurotransmitter types. the brain might overcome this by increasing the total gain, i.e. reducing the inhibition of signals, which does not only increase depth but unfortunately also width, i.e. reduces selectivity between signal sources.

01:05:59 pm

the idea that the insufficient signal penetration might relate to timing, i.e. my brain is acting too fast, and tries to work with incomplete representations, is fascinating

01:07:09 pm

conversely, i think that synesthesia is indicative of the opposite: deeper signal penetration than normal. could be the result of increasing the gain for a more healthy starting configuration than mine my posit is that we always are seeing in the "future"; .

some people seem to be living permanently in the past

01:08:45 pm

some perceive the components of things instead of the things

01:08:59 pm

attention is weird

it takes time for the input to be perceived. . . music as i sent you , gives pleasure as the future is already known and makes you peaceful.

blacks clocks prioritize kinesthetic inputs . . . mobjects. mactions. minputs. (mental objects , mental. actions mental inputs.)

watching your ghost in the machine made it obvious that your clock is broken

i think in addition people are careless when saying I perceived it. first you had an input . it took time to process before you see it. more time to understand it. . there is good work on G , general intelligene that only measure speed.

A problem with my presentation was that I did not take time for a rehearsal. And never did, and don't do postmortems because I dislike watching myself. So I have no good mental model of what I look like to others when I am on stage.

07:26:56 am

I am still terrified of boring my audience, and I get bored myself very easily; I have difficulty to follow a presentation if the data rate is too low. There are more people like me, and they tend to like the speed, but I am aware that I should optimize the performance much better. I'd probably need some professional help with that.

Btw, Gino had booked a string of rooms at Davos and so he could help me to find one.

I have sent Gino's person Yanling a message to ask if they have a bed left. (I think they just have a shared space with multiple people in it that are willing to have little privacy.) I let you know as soon as I hear back from them.

06:03:36 pm

I also checked on AirBnb and there are places left between Jan 21st and 25th!

06:07:29 pm

Update: They have a bed, but it is a shared space. Is ██████ fine with that?
