My mother was born Paris and I have been fortunate enough to visit Paris on many occasions. I feel closely connected to this magnificent European capital. Being fluent in French and having French genes parading through my body leave me no choice but to consider myself part of France..

When on my most recent visit to Paris, After indulging myself on baguettes I made my way to a few of the more elegant fashion shows. First Chanel's spring and summer ready-to-wear show and in and then the Valentino haute couture show. I was privileged to attend the Parisian Debutantes Ball (representing Chanel), where I met some of the most remarkable people from cities across the world. When I spend time in Paris I am able to feel its vitality not only see it. The city sings to me and I never tire of its artistic and historical richness. I have also had the pleasure of living in Rome, which is where I initially developed my passion for art and culture. I'm afraid I spent much of my free time indoors, visiting the vast panoply of museums, the opera and discovering Italy's wealth of cultural offerings very soon, realizing that I wanted to pursue my passion for art history at AUP.</=>

Attending The American University of Paris would also represent the natural evolution of my education, both received at home and in school: my father is [REDACTED] but my mother is [REDACTED] and thanks to her I attended the French Lycée in Rome, earning a French Baccalauréat with a major in Economic and Social Sciences. I am fluent in Italian and French, but also in English because I studied it in school and mastered it during my frequent trips to the United States, where [REDACTED] I have been exposed and appreciate the American culture because of my internships with Bulgari's US office, in Los Angeles and the Ferragamo US PR department in New York City. My family origin and the education I received seem to lead me to an American University in Paris where I will be able to put my skills into practice and pursue my academic objectives and goals.

Studying art history at the American University of Paris would be a great opportunity to further discover the French culture. I believe that the education I will acquire by completing an AUP undergraduate program, coupled with additional internship experience, will equip me with all necessary skills to achieve my future career goal to work in the art or fashion industry.
