Thank you for the response. I would welcome any and all help and/or input from you as starting a business is and will be a new experience for me. I am also well aware that this is your expertise.

I met with a criminal attorney I know from Broward this morning and he thinks with my skills and experience, the market is huge. In fact, he already has some work for me and is willing to help me network, etc... the competition for me are the Don Carpenters of the world, etc..., but they don't have the paralegal skills I have and the ability to perform the legal aspect as well as the investigator side. I have been pondering it for a while and it's scary, but I am not getting any younger.

I have resumes out at other firms, but it may be time to go in another direction and if I fail, at least so do on my own accord. You always asked me what it is I wanted to do, well I guess now I finally know. I recognize that it is not something I can just do overnight, but I am trying to get the wheels in motion (business plan, etc...).

Any advice you have will be welcomed, as always.

Jess

Hope all well. Just wanted to give you a heads up. I am contemplating and in the process of forming my own LLC and performing freelance paralegal and private investigator work. I have met with a few people and I think from a mental health and business standpoint, this may be the best decision for me and my future.

That being said, if you want to discuss me assisting you with the trial with Brad, we might be able to work something out. But most importantly, we should discuss what if anything you need document wise from BCLC to proceed with what you have going on now. While I am hoping I can dictate my exit, I am not sure I am going to have control of that at this point.

I am also exploring/pursuing and currently speaking with other firms, but I am not sure that's the route I want to take at this point in my life. Either way, my time there is going to be limited and I don't want to leave you high and dry in the middle of you trying this case against Searcy (assuming that actually happens), because I doubt they (BCLC) will be very receptive to assisting you with what you may need.

Let me know if you want/need to discuss further.
