As my career as one of the best yoga teachers in the US has fallen short...

I want to start a blog on design related things. I am using polyvore to experiment and play with ideas and to see how many followers I can get and at what pace, and also to create something so that I can show you what I mean. I love being on it. The concept of going to a store or going to look around physically for things seems insane when in one instant you can have access to a thousand times more online. You can create rooms and when someone moves their mouse over the furniture, they can see where it is from, the cost of it, and click on a link directly to the website. I never used to buy clothes online and now it is all I do. It is so tedious and time consuming to physically go to a store. Your searches are so refined on polyvore or other online platforms. You can type in for eg: white silk blouse with black buttons xs and hundreds of options are immediately available to you at different price points. Imagine how long it would take to search bloomingdales for that exact thing and maybe find a couple of options. The idea of going to a store and looking around for what one wants seems crazy. People can watch trends online and go straight for it in seconds. Complete the whole process in less time than you would spend in a store even just waiting in line to pay.

Also, half the blogs I read aren't even written in proper English, an advantage I have when doing anything online.

Anyway... That's what I love doing with my time. (I don't know if it can become anything more than just a hobby)

I want to have babies within the next 4 - 5 years and live near the ocean.

Sunshine, flowers, ocean, yoga, beautiful things, babies and love are my plan.

Regarding Gregory:

It is a pleasure. I showed him everything and gave him print outs of the floor plans, and corresponding furniture pics sent by artefacto.

He liked the work Anthony did on the studio and thought that could be a model and standard for the others.

I have been studying all the rules about driving in the US. It is so much stricter than SA!!!
I find it so interesting
