Not much. I was able to get a small team to do some digging on motivations =n crowd behavior and with a special focus on sports, but not much turned u=, aside from how poorly mapped it is. The history of football was good to =ecount, in that in the middle ages whole villages would play each other an= it could turn hostile, but perhaps this actually diffused violence overal= if it helped people settle petty scores and move on, rather for grudges t= fester into something more mutually destructive (thus keeping fit but sav=ng energy for important conflict). Similar things are seen in ritualized c=nflicts in animals, and one wonders how many ways this is woven into commo= culture today in social conflicts expressed through the media, etc.

Overall, lots of soft emotional stuff, and probably hard to study from bott=m up via complex motivations and emotions but probably easier to understan= via the evolution and design of mass entertainment and mass media.

Still, there is potential here....
