I would not act till then. And I would hit very hard on media's willingness to hide behind court documents and repeat all manner of preposterous allegations. In that regard, I think you should prepare a detailed list of the most preposterous aspects of all this--this will give the NYT and WSJ some pause.

Probably. Issue is how much this is spreading to US, or if it is still remains mostly British tabloid story?

I think that is a reasonably good approach. I might make the central point that court documents are a back door way to make protected libelous allegations. Plaintiffs in pursuit of settlements can wildly and improbably allege anything they want--the media then can repeat this without any obligation to verify. I would add this is particularly true of the British tabloid press, and in particular, the Daily Mail and its campaign against Prince Andrew. Then issue the emphatic denial.

Can you give me time middle of the month and schedule Gat=s? Obviously, no time like now to deal with this. And this will be a game=hanging rebuttal.
