It feels dilettantish not to finish what I started, but you're right re: attention being addicting and worthless. It is more or less exactly that. But we live in a specialized world and I'm no specialist: when I started (acting) I thought I would make myself a specialist in that field, until I realized it wasn't a real career. It doesn't mean to waste our time. I know you don't email. I am having trouble conceiving of the next step so I'm regressing. The only way forward is to take RS Wurman's job away from him and take over the conference. Then I can be a professional dilettante.

old thinking suggests you should finish what you started.. it worked in a slow changing world. . I would suggest that the path leads to quite obvious results. no matter how much time you had taken to perfect your stride .re decisions time spent , backed by great evidence ,simply increases the ratio of heat to light. and diminishes accuracy of results. I would suggest that the wagon falling is apt. . the pleasure from the attention (your cool lake dipping). is addicting and in the end worthless. sorry. I have more faith in you than you have..

Wagon+falling is the wrong analogy. It's more of a cool lake+dipping thing. I had a long mano-a-mano with [REDACTED]. He said it would be foolish to drop it after spending so much time seriously learning and pursuing it. He did compare me to a carpenter, though I'm pretty sure a carpenter is more steadily employable than [REDACTED]. These days every decision I make feels irrational, though the time I spend making them would suggest otherwise.

Wonder whether Gates is any good at eating and how Ariely is irrational.

[REDACTED] has been really fun. [REDACTED] arrives next week. Counter to my expectations, it's been invigorating.. [REDACTED] [REDACTED] with. I'm sorry to miss you but I'll be back in NY soon.
