I the heat of battle, I forgot to invite you--and whomever you want to bring along--if you are in the mood or in NYC, to a performance of Bruckner 8 at Symphony Space at 4 PM this Sunday the 24th.

The format is unusual and often fun: I first give a 30/40 minute talk with the orchestra on stage, talking about the piece using live musical examples. This time I will compare for the audience the 1887 first version with the composer's changes and revisions, which he made for the 1890 performance, as a result of criticisms he received. A rare glimpse into the psychology and workshop of a composer.

Then after a brief intermission (when I apparently will be presented, briefly with the "gold" medal from the Bruckner Society--no money) we will play the piece. After that, the audience is invited to ask questions, either of me or the players on stage.

These things are often sold out, so if you want to go, let me know--I can always get a bunch of seats.
