My last email to you ever on this childishness. I am repulsed. I maintain highest standard of ethical behaviour at the office and in my professional affairs.

I have never stepped into your office without you being there ever. 100% of any information I received is from [REDACTED] Eileen or Richard. I may have printed your files which had been scanned by [REDACTED] and you may have conflated with your own. I find your insinuations slanderous. I will take lie detector test to prove and an oath on bible.

Rich,

As you may recall, earlier this week, building maintenance came into our offices and forgot to lock the door behind them. I am locking my door for security reasons (to ensure that items in my office are not taken).

The real question is, why are you trying to get into my office when I am not there? I was not going to raise this issue but since you have, I will do so. In the past I have found my personal files (including working papers and notes) in your office. These were taken and my personal files were copied without my permission. As I have explained in the past, all of the legal files are in the hallway file cabinets for everyone's use and access. [REDACTED] can help you find whatever you need. Files in my office are my personal working papers and drafts. For attorney client privilege and other reasons, the files in my office are not for general consumption. I would be grateful if you would respect that.

Also, I have invited you numerous times to come by and speak with me rather than send emails when you wish to discuss something. I am two doors down. I think we will have a better working relationship if you simply start talking to me.

If you want to discuss this further—please let's do it with Larry rather than via email. Thanks for your cooperation.

I noticed your door was locked - is there a reason? I was under impression the policy was for our doors were to be left unlocked
