Dear [REDACTED]

When we spoke last week you indicated you knew of an individual who may be interested in learning about my research, and who would want to see some of the primary literature. To this end I attach a few of our papers. Amador 2013 is the recent major result I mentioned in our conversation. In arriving at that result we used sleeping birds, but only for a technical advantage. Attached are four other papers that describe some of our sleep and learning results in birds. The Dave 2000 paper describes song replay ("birds dreaming of singing"); Shank 2009 demonstrates how physiology in the brain is shaped by early vocal learning, and Rauske 2010 shows how the activity patterns of neurons are sculpted on a nightly basis by sleep. Brawn 2013 presents a different model system (sleep and auditory perception, not sleep and vocal production), showing how different memories interfere with each other in a sleep-dependent fashion during initial memory acquisition.

Finally, I also attach one more sleep perceptual learning study (Fenn 2003): in humans, on speech, work done in collaboration with Howard.

I am grateful for the help you are extending to me. It was a pleasure to meet with you during your visit here to University of Chicago last week. I hope we can meet again in the future.

Cheers,

Dan Margoliash
