Understood.

Some of the switches are in the side ledges / drinkrails near the cup holders which have been plated in the pearlite silver.

Personally, I believe that they will now look odd sitting next to the polished chrome.

Additionally, since the seats are all pearlite silver, shouldn't the switches in the divan arm rests be the pearlite silver - not the chrome?

Lastly, a couple of the switches are in the headliner of the cockpit, etc. They would "blend in" better in the pearlite vs. the chrome.

Your thoughts?

I just spent about an hour and a half going through photo's of the aircraft to see which; if any, parts would like nice in polished chrome vs. the pearlite silver.

My conclusion is that we have used the polished chrome very sparingly (lav and galley sink and faucets, towel bar in the aft lav and in the main cabin on the conference table trim border.

I believe that we could implement a touch more of the polished chrome in the main cabin area and suggest that we use the polish chrome on the 2 end "bullets" that will be a part of the chair back rest pull down detail (chrome bullet, leather, chrome bullet). These are the pieces that Jay had creatively covered in tin foil as a mock up.

You could also use the polish chrome on the seat belt buckle hardware for a little "pop" that would be spread visually throughout the cabin without being overbearing. Just a nice, clean detail to compliment and show creativity.

Good morning Jeffrey,

Have you given any more thought to the "shiny" (polished chrome) metal plating?
