Jews around the world were inspired last month when Arab-Israeli teenager Mohammad Zoabi cloaked himself in an Israeli flag and spoke into a bedroom video camera, "I am an Israeli and will remain an Israeli. Israel will remain a Jewish and a democratic country." As the current Israel-Hamas conflict persists, such voices are often drowned out. But another voice bubbling above the surface has little to do with Israel and everything to do with fighting Hamas. It is the voice of Muslims calling on their peers to fight the advance of political Islamism over Islam. Read the full story here.

Israel making positive strides in uphill battle on the information front

JNS.ORG Israel has been taking its licks in the international arena since it launched Operation Protective Edge against Hamas in Gaza on July 8. But criticism of the Jewish state was actually worse during its last battle with Hamas in 2012 and the Second Lebanon War in the summer of 2006, experts say. Israel appears to have learned from past hasbara (public diplomacy) mistakes and has improved the way it delivers its message to the media and the public, both in the United States and internationally. The business of hiring and getting hired at Jewish non-profits

JNS.ORG It has been six years since the economy crashed in 2008, and while finding employment has been a challenge, the tide may be taking a turn for the better—particularly in the non-profit sector. But where do Jewish non-profits fall within the current landscape, from the perspective of both job-seekers and employers? Read the full story here.

Gaza conflict spotlights role of Qatar, the Hamas-funding U.S. ally

JNS.ORG The oil-rich Gulf state of Qatar's influence has been widely felt during the ongoing Israel-Hamas conflict. While traditionally closely aligned with Iran, Hamas has pivoted to Sunni powers like Qatar and Turkey in recent years for economic and political support. Keen to expand its regional and international influence, Qatar's ties to the Palestinian terrorist group have drawn increasing criticism from Israel, the United States, and even fellow Arab states like Egypt and Saudi Arabia, who accuse Qatar of undermining regional stability by supporting Hamas.
