THat is a slippery slope. good intentions are usually behind most wars. each side believing their intentions are honorable. Good intentions assumes you have a right to insert your intentions into someone elses sphere. Are you really aware of your true intentions. ? or do you mask them even to yourself. ? , best possible outcome for all?.. what if you are on a different team.? does the all include the other side?.. Is it in their interest to lose the game.? are they not part of the " all ". or is it only your team

Going back to the science of communication, its not manipulation if you truly believe that whatever you are proposing will lead to the best possible outcome for all those involved. That's the only way I do business and I assume that's the same for you. Having good intentions is what's important in life, we are not always responsible for outcomes.
