We have the old Flickr PRO account... unlimited uploads and ability to download full resolution photos as well as order on line. They still offer that account but it costs more. We pay $25/year and now maybe 50. You can link to it from email or FB, as you frequently see me dol.

We use Walgreens for our on-line orders.

Also Picassa, the Kodak site and others. With Flickr you can view without and account.

Check these examples:

We average 10,000 views a day 'cause folks like the photos of Diana. All our photos are public, but you can designate friends or family, each being more restrictive. May users have NO public photos. For friends or family, the other person must have a Flickr account and you must designate them friends or family. Then they can see the photos that you have designated friends or family. Family can see all. Friends are limited to friends and public.

I think there is a tool to designate one time access by email to a non-Flickr contact, but don't remember the details.

You can access Flickr with any device. I routinely upload from my phone and by DragAndDrop from ACDSsee, my desktop photo organizer.

Might meet Ike's requirements.
