Ghislaine Maxwell

Your Honor,

Ghislaine has been a friend of mine for over 25 years. I met her through my deceased husband who was an old friend of hers. They met I think, first in Hong Kong in the early 1990s.

My husband died some three years ago leaving me - without any notice - both destitute and effectively homeless. I had nowhere I could stay apart from a room at my mother's house in the countryside in England where I had not lived for over 30 years. I am still involved in an ongoing and messy probate.

Ghislaine, without judgment or prejudice, offered me a roof over my head in her home in London free of charge or bill payments until I could get back on my feet so to speak. I had nothing to give her and she had nothing to gain from me living there. Given those circumstances I think it says a great deal about Ghislaine's moral character: in particular her loyalty and kindness towards someone who could offer her nothing in return. When another friend subsequently offered to pay rent for me this was still at a substantially lower than market rate.

I want to conclude by saying that never in my wildest dreams do I think Ghislaine could be guilty of the terrible charges against. Like anyone charged with any crime, she is innocent unless proven guilty and has a right to due process and humane treatment and should be treated accordingly.

Yours respectfully,

Lady Tang
