Thanks, [REDACTED]. Sorry for my delayed response – I somehow missed this email. I'll plan to respond to [REDACTED] as follows – but let me know if this doesn't get it right.
We can conduct searches with multiple search terms. That said, to the extent we are asked to run several variations to get a sense of the volume of documents, we would ask that those requests be specific and focused. I hope that helps. Happy to discuss if you have any additional questions.

Subject: RE: Brunel

The short answer is yes, Relativity permits searches with multiple search restrictions. There is a limit to how many variations and connectors we're willing to test-run for volume, of course. If they asked us to run all the different [REDACTED] name constructions as search terms in combination with all of the other terms they gave us, we'd have to run dozens and dozens of searches. So they'd need to send us a narrow universe of very specific requests in order for us to run searches this way.

Feel free to call me if you have any questions about this. And I know you've both used relativity, so let me know if you have a different take.
