- Looked for a few hours and didn't any articles that had sections focused on third party presence
- Has seen grooming the environment in forensic and clinical practice. Have provided treatment to adult men who were abused as children as part of boy scouts. Often they described a troop leader who was primary perpetrator, but often there was another adult/senior boy, who was also a victim but also used (or coerced) to procure or befriend other kids.
- Does not specifically use the term "grooming the environment," but this is part of her views in general about grooming.
- Perpetrators put themselves in positions where they have ready access. Locate themselves where there's a lower barrier for contact and reduce natural hesitancy because the perpetrator belongs there
