That sounds like a dream. And of course raging with envy. I hope [REDACTED] is out and you found a good new candidate to take her place. Xx

Listen, you've made a choice to surround yourself with these young women in a capacity that bleeds -- perhaps, somewhat arbitrarily -- from the professional into the personal and back. This is the choice you make (not just for the renegade and ironic enjoyment of it, I'm sure) and though these women are young, they are not too young to know that they are making a very particular choice in taking on this role with you. Especially in the aftermath of your trial which, after all, was public and could be-- indeed was --interpreted as a powerful man taking advantage of powerless young women, instead of the other way around.

It does not affect my friendship with you as I'm sure it does not affect the friendship you have with those of your female friends that have stuck by you since the trial. And I believe you are candid with the girls about what is required of them and that in return for mentorship as well as access, education and a general polishing they would never receive elsewhere, they are made aware of the somewhat unusual parameters of the job before they take it on. But! I do believe there will always be people who think they can take advantage or that rules (unwritten or not) don't apply to them. And though [REDACTED] did not strike me as especially smart she did have a sort of brutal or steely quality, grasping too, that you see in a lot of Eastern Bloc models, most of which never become really successful and then fall into this prostitute/expensive call girl thing once their careers fizzle. They don't care, they just want, want, want. She perhaps has this quality, for better or worse, of thinking she can take you on, or best you. But I could be v wrong. I mean, I like a rebel. Or a spy. I just don't want one working for me. Or for my friends.

I don't really understand your question so forgive my presumptuousness.
