Eliot Spitzer Seeks to Enter New York City Comptroller Race

Eliot Spitzer, who resigned as governor of New York five years ago amid a prostitution scandal, is re-entering political life, with a run for the citywide office of comptroller and a hope that voters have forgiven his prior misconduct, he said in an interview.

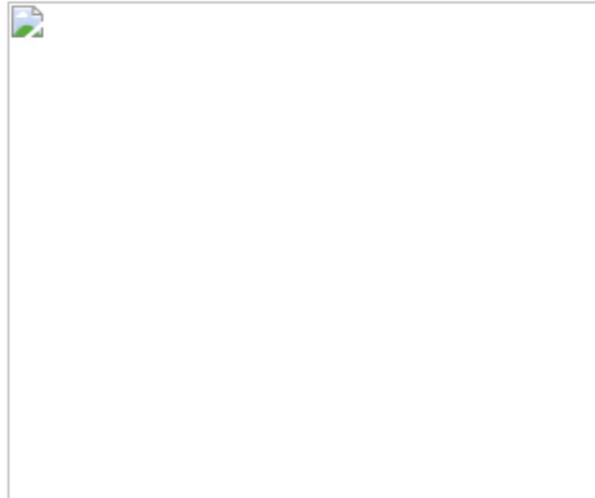

The son of a wealthy real estate developer, Mr. Spitzer said he intends to pay for his campaign out of his own fortune.

To make the primary ballot in September, Mr. Spitzer must collect a minimum of 3,750 signatures from registered voters by Thursday.

His re-entry comes in an era when politicians, including South Carolina Representative Mark Sanford and New York mayoral contender Anthony Weiner, have shown that public disapproval, especially over sexual misconduct, can be fleeting, and voters seem open to those who seek forgiveness and redemption.
