But this is a real difference. Two different kinds of company: one makes software, the other does designs & prototypes. Design offices have done well in tech (eg Noyes & IBM, Frog Design & Apple), & of course in other areas (Bertone et al; Porsche); but, granted, there are no software design houses yet. They'd produce "concept car" software to be picked up & manufactured by other companies (like Pininfarina designs picked up by Fiat, Ferrari etc). Maybe it wouldn't work, but it's an attractive idea; puts all the brainpower in the right place.

I'll try to call tmw AM if that's OK.

I understand, you continue to focus on making money,, methods , size , how. IT will not work that way,,, Focus on the product,, everything else will fall into place.. Each conversation , I have to get you off the money piece.

a small idea lab maps out the web future, based on streams & steam algebra, as described in bullets; we file patents; some cite our earlier ip as prior art. But we don't build any software, just a flash demo or prototype that does nothing but make the idea concrete to everyone. We got this prediction stuff right before; how can we fail a 2nd time to cash in? This way we do; we need no deals w/ Plainfield. Don't even want any. Someone else will implement the software & they need a license from us & one from Plainfield. That's the problem. The biz plan isn't to stop the future by suing it, but to be in a position to compel interest from large players & make a deal with one. Also this is cheaper than plan 1, & gets off the ground quicker.

Great! Thanks. I'll see you Mon early? Otherwise will try Tues, etc I'm not supposed to mention the Boston guy's name; I know him strictly as an art collector. (But his books are out of print & last I looked going for over $1000 each for some on ebay. Very nice serious, thoughtful guy.) David

I never meant to put you in a position where you had to say "can't do that, b/c of FBI etc." I knew Plainfield was being "investigated," but this aspect never occurred to me. Should have. Even if there's no IP relationship between a new company & Plainfield, no doubt I'm a connection all by myself if we're doing anything in that part of the universe.

If you have time any day next wk, I'd still love to know how you size the thing up as we go on to other potential people. Tmw I'm in Boston delivering paintings [to an investor whose financial brilliance is spoken of with awe -- tho not be me]; any other day, M-F?

Thanks a lot. Still love to have you in Woodbridge--
