 This Week on Kickstarter

MAY 03, 2012

This week's projects will make your head spin — or, at the very least, your dishware. Check out a line of bowls that are easy to rock but impossible to spill, an indie musician on a mission to make her biggest album yet, and a photographic meditation on our musical southern roots.

Put a spin on it

Wobble Bowls were designed to bring a little bit of fun to your dining table. They're a series of round-bottomed, brightly colored all-purpose bowls that are easy to set in motion — watch 'em rock and twirl! — but they never spill. Whether you're accident-prone or just like to play with your food, these nifty guys are fun and totally functional. Your morning cereal will never be the same again.

Going her own way

You might already know Amanda Palmer from her stint with indie-cabaret act The Dresden Dolls, her marriage to author Neil Gaiman, or any number of her exploits as a piano-playing, ukulele-wielding, creativity-inspiring indie star. Her latest release, anticipated by eager fans for years, will be a multimedia explosion of collaborative art featuring contributors like Tao Lin, Shepard Fairey, and Robyn Hitchcock. When you're Amanda Freakin' Palmer, you go big or go home.

A Southern state of mind

In 2010, Shane Lavalette was commissioned by the High Museum of Art in Atlanta to create a new body of photographs for their "Picturing the South" series. Having grown up listening to traditional Southern music, he decided the region's vibrant musical past would be the ideal lens through which to explore its current cultural landscape. The resulting series of photographs is as spirited and poignant as the sounds that inspired it.
