agree... but the question is which niches are maladaptive, and if they are and persist, why do they? And I insist my presentation is funnier than any of the evangelists.. :)

of course. I really don't have a view, I find the similarities re your presentation and the religious right highly amusing, I share your beliefs entirely, but recognize that in a world built on evolution, a random sample of ideas is always always beneficial, you are being ignorant of the basic concept, no one strategy, explore and occupy as many niches as possible so that if the environment changes, some strategy survives, I don't want everyone to think alike, this depresses me of course.. sorry for the waste of 76 min of your time.... thought there was a narrative thread, beginning with the science and then moving toward the atheist thing.. anyway, I don't want to belabor it.. I was thinking about it since I got your first message.. Would like to have a rational discussion with you about why the myths you mention are not as dangerous as the ones we were talking about (I don't think much of Thomas Friedman, but his piece in the NYT today emphasizes to me the point I wanted to make to you).. I also realize good friends can disagree, and discuss their disagreements, and we will, I hope do that.. (Hitchens was a pro at having a broad range of close friends he completely disagreed with).

anyway, at least you didn't have to buy a ticket to watch it. :)

Watched every nauseating moment, like watching a car wreck hoping that some small signs of intelligent life would emerge, but alas ..d.o.a. ....shameful more painful than a home movie of Johnnynplaying the violin

wow... I thought it was at least entertaining..( and that we got some science in for those who have never heard this stuff and came for the stars).. it is a rock and roll tour film and was meant to be seen in that light, which is how you should view it I think.. I thought ending it with the quote from Bill Pullman about people bashing each others brains out was something you would appreciate.. namely that it ended with the question, is any of this worthwhile? does it get across anything? I insisted we end on that ambiguity.. did you watch the stuff during the final credits?

this is worst piece of crap ive seen, it is embarrassing, beyond anything else you have done, the music at the end is the religious music of the fundamentalist christina, sarah silverman, rick gervais are brain dead, the crowds cheering and intros are as nauseating as a billy grahim revival, why don't you attack the belife that love last forever, that all pople are created equal, that older women are as attractive and sexy as younger ones, that , there is no scientific justifiacion and proof of the concept of hope? that the feeling of love is a myth and has no scientific basis, and should be discarded , the people , presentation , vitriol for others belifes is merely a differnet mental infection in a different guise, this was beyond distateful stupid, having cameron diaz saay that knowledge is power and wasting the digital imprint on such drivle is an insult to the power of the bits that it took to describe this idiot
