Dear Jeffrey,

I appreciate your honesty, and I agree with you. I should have focused more on you, and how to best satisfy you and your needs. But, please keep in mind, I had more questions, questions that I did not have the opportunity to ask, and questions that were certainly not about me. One was how to best prepare myself to satisfy you. When we discussed the blanket example, or the telephone call- example, I regarded it as a discussion on how you wanted the work to get done well. And, I actually asked you how to best prepare for this and you answered that I will learn...

Overall, my questions were intended to understand what the job implied, so as to be able to understand/ask how to perform it the best. I can only say that I am regretful that my questions came across as silly, stupid, and selfish.

Nevertheless, I see your point and I missed my chance.

I have learnt a very hard lesson, and I wish I could redo things. But please keep in mind that if you regret your decision, and if I got the opportunity I would do everything I could to satisfy you. Once again, and with the risk of being repetitive, if you want to talk with me again, just let me know.

Finally, and once again, thank you for your honesty, your time, and your consideration.

Warm regards,
[REDACTED]

As you know I cherish honesty, so I will tell you that even the concept that I should be concerned with what you should tell your friends about who you work for was silly, it is not my problem, with serious people, business leaders, politicians, etc. your list of questions was all about you. your repeated one, was are you willing to teach me. what would I learn, can I sit in on meetings. why should I work for you? I am ambitious, will this lead me to the place I want to be? sorry but all of these questions show a great deal about your focus, motivation and goals.. not one time did you ask, what should I practice, study, need to know to do a better job or even to prepare for a job. it was all about you and what you wanted, needed, desired, sought.

Dear Jeffrey,

Thank you for your feedback and quick reply, very much appreciated!!

Speaking from my heart, I had been thinking about how big of a dream it would be working for you, and I can only blame myself not for expressing it to you when we met yesterday. I thought that when we spoke on Skype I told you that I am very flexible, hard working, serious, and that I wanted to be committed to you 150% (in fact, that was why I wanted the summer to end what I have started with in a good way).

I realize that in emphasis it now is too late, but believe me, I am hard working, very committed, serious, flexible, loyal, possess a big integrity and I would be there all the time to meet your needs. I hope that my resume testify to this. Also, I believe we see the difference between being Swedish and American; a Swede is usually more modest. I learnt a very very taught lesson from this.

Also, since you asked me to come to Caribbean I thought that these qualities was clear, and that I really wanted the job, and I thought that when we met yesterday I would have a chance to raise my questions about it (as I knew very little about) – not reinforcing the qualities and my high ambition to satisfy you. I misunderstood the purpose of the meeting yesterday and I am sorry. I was not my intention to have the attitude of 'what can you do for me'...

It might be too late, as you might already have given the offer to the other girl, but if you possess any interest in me as a candidate, may I ask for a second chance? Maybe another Skype interview?
Warmest best,

I became a bit sad reading your email though; should I take it as if you are not interested in me as a candidate? If so, why? I have large ambitions in life, and I had to question how working for your would benefit me in those ambitions and goals...

I am sorry to say that i think your focus is in direct contradiction to getting a serious job in the private sector. No true business or person would tolerate an attitude of I m trying to decide what your biz can do for me.?!!!!. After you left , another interviewee started with , this is my dream job, I m a hard worker , I want to do a good job for you, what should I study to be more of a help to you and your organization. she is getting the chance, lets see.

I wish you good luck.
