Your response was not as funny as i had hoped. You do realize that my email was a joke right?

Anyway, hope you are well.

Hey,

I don't see the point in touching the past. However, let me tell you this.

How you can compare our relationship with a ping pong game? Such a bad comparison that tells me a lot now...

Stan, relationship is not about a competition but about being a team and helping each other to win. Despite the fact you knew my situation I recieved no support but judgement. Instead of seeking a solution together, you found it is easier to run and not deal with it. That's fine but please don't tell me that you are the one who were a fair player in this "game"

[REDACTED],

I saw something today that made me think of you and brought back some unresolved issues in our past relationship. There are things we need to discuss. I'm sure you feel the same way. It's important to me that you understand my perspective. I think I already know what you will say but I want you to know that you are wrong. Absolutely wrong.

Earlier today I was going for a run and came across two people.... like us in the past. And the memories came rushing back. They were playing ping-pong. And it made it me think – you never admitted that you lost that game of in Florida. Yes, technically you won but there was a lot of cheating. Any reasonable person would see that you actually lost. Firstly, cheating is an automatic disqualification. That's a fact. But even still, the second point is that without cheating my skills would have won as I was clearly the superior player.

So please just take a day or two to think it over. I know this is a bitter pill to swallow but in the end you will feel better admitting the truth to the whole world. Find peace [REDACTED] Embrace reality for your own good. It's time for the healing to begin.

Love always,

Stan
