Hi again. I responded to you quickly because I'm on the go- but upon further thought, I'd also like to include the following:

Please extend my sincere thanks to Jeffrey for taking the time to see me. I realize he's a very busy man whose time is in great demand. I'm truly appreciative that he was interested enough in me 'on paper' at least, to make the time to meet me. (I was also getting over a cold when I met him and think I may have been a bit spacey and probably not my best and lucid self... so, that's unfortunate!

Nonetheless, I respect his decision and would remain interested in any opportunities to work with him in the future on a project basis. My skills in design, event planning and party organizing in general, are extremely refined, even if I failed to present this at our meeting. And, I'm well connected, an excellent problem solver and overflowing with creative ideas and organizational aptitude.

And on a personal note; we have a few colleagues, friends and old associates in common, although I didn't think it was appropriate to mention this in an interview. But to that effect, I'd also like to say that I was glad to meet him in person, found him very charming and affable, and have a deep regard for his intellectual and financial contributions to the progressive scientific community at large- which happens to be of great interest to me. I regret not mentioning this in person and hope you will relay it on my behalf.

Okay, that's all! Thanks again and good luck again finding the perfect match for the position. I'm sorry it wasn't me. [REDACTED] made the position sound so idyllic and very appealing to someone with my experience, skills, interests and personality.

Very best,
Kimberly Sexton
