Every physics theory has at least an implicit/tacit meta-language/Wittgensteinian “picture” undergirding it. However, that is not much value. If the predictions of the theory and if its explanations of puzzles do not accord with observations, which depend on the theory in a two-way street so to speak - then we trash the theory along with its metaphysics without giving it a second thought.

There is no room for ideology in science - that is bad and bogus science.

No room for absolute certainty of the validity of ontological models.

One example of an ideologue misleading the gullible is Deepak Chopra when he talks about quantum physics it makes every honest physicist irritable.

One man's interpretation is another's "ideology".
