Do Convicted Palestinian Terrorists Receive Payments from the Palestinian Authority?

The Palestinian Authority constantly pleads poverty, and has shamed the international community into providing billions of dollars in aid to help the Palestinian public, an amount far greater per capita than what populations in far worse conditions receive. But those in greatest need receive little of the money because the corrupt dictatorship of Mahmoud Abbas siphons off millions of dollars for family members and cronies.

The Insidious Relationship Between Faculty and BDS

Money is flowing to the campus for BDS activities, but the amounts, at least those that are visible, appear relatively trivial, especially when compared to the investments of the pro-Israel community, which are growing following the announcement of plans by the Israeli government and American philanthropists to spend tens of millions of dollars to preempt, deter and defeat BDS campaigns. The bottom line is that the pro-Israel, anti-BDS organizations form a well-funded, well-coordinated network, not the student organizations promoting BDS. This does not take into account, however, the less visible but more insidious influence of faculty who support the BDS movement. "They help sustain and feed support for the campus movement in a way that would be impossible without them," noted Samarov and Cohen. "For example, at University of Texas at Austin, the divestment resolution was written by Professor Snehal Shingavi. The student activists who introduced the resolution this year will leave, but he will stay and be in a position to ensure that the campaign continues."

The Two-State Delusion: A Coroner's Report of a Defunct Solution

Padraig O'Malley, professor of peace and reconciliation at the University of Massachusetts and author of the recently published The Two State Delusion: Israel Palestine - A Tale of Two Narratives, discusses with host Gilad Halpern, why what for decades was the most likely resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, has ceased to have any chances of survival.
