My view:

- 1) Nothing to be gained by talking to him--especially considering that the book, if it is to come out in August, is already written;
- 2) He's only trying to talk to you to lend credibility to what he already has;
- 3) I'll bet the delay, as indicated by the publisher, involves legal vetting and Little, Brown lawyers asking him to reach out to you for comment;
- 4) The fact that the lawyers might be nervous offers you an opportunity to indicate that they might expect an aggressive response from you to the book, meaning they will be more conservative in what they let him say;
- 5) I would have your attorneys write the letter I suggest you write; again, book publishers are not journalistic organizations and do not have the resources to independently vet facts so they always runs scared.
