That sounds depressing, but you're probably right.

So, onto more specific questions...

1. "giving a try" working for Leon could mean a million things. A million GREAT things. He's compelling, we get along, and I really like the idea of working on Phaidon, but would this grace period serve to give us both an idea where and how I could be most useful or would I start working? Is there a job available or am I too narrow-minded to think of the world as my oyster and a job as something I create...
2. Should I be communicating directly with Leon at this stage. Or is he still marinating?
3. I'd be coming back from Europe around the 17th, will just buy another ticket to NY instead of LA. I could swing right into the saddle on the 20th.
4. Very nice of you to offer me one of your apartments. Where are they? Will [REDACTED] cook for me?

Will write more specifically when I get home. Was in car most of day after we spoke. Had a meeting with someone who unexpectedly wants to invest in my little after school program here. I am v excited by the prospect of working with Leon. Will brain storm and send more specific questions. Also, thank you.

Bespoke shoes by George Esquivel: hand made in USA, beautiful (though the selection on-line is not terribly enticing) <http://esquivelshoes.com> I own a few brogues by him that I love

I really think they should all be wearing at least thematically similar outfits when you go around to conferences with them, or when you have guests over to the house. It would be extremely chic/obnoxious.

When you're traveling it's a different story. Or maybe it's best to have a mall army of attractive women in uniform following you around WHEREVER you go.

I thought of a few brands. If you need visuals let me know sweet boyish suits from Band of Outsiders

Swiss tailoring, pretty conservative and sleek from Akris

American sportswear tailoring, very straight forward and elegant by Derek Lam or Jil Sander, which is timeless and classic, though once it gets into the stores might be a bit boring.

I know you could engage any of these brands to design capsule collections for you if you really wanted to.

But of course Valentino is the best.
