try it,, its a different idea rather than a better one, and i'm not sure it precludes you from doing both

Hello. Wasn't sure if I missed a call from you so I wanted to check in. Was nice talking to you the other day and was hoping we could finish our conversation.

I was offered an opportunity to set up a massage space at [REDACTED] u've consistently said experience is a better choice than schooling.. Was wondering if you thought taking this offer is a better idea than getting certified?

Hope you had a good wkend.

it was always a bad idea!!!... i have been consistant.. The feedback is from people that like massages.. not an diverse group. it is not distinctive, every hotel has it and loses money on it. and considering their clientele changes and that they are usually exhausted it is a good framework to see that the idea dos not have legs/ e mail me a phone number and it will try to call

Hello again. I thought I should tell you my whole situation since I am, probably inappropriately, once again asking for your help. I started a massage company, [REDACTED] I have set up massage rooms at [REDACTED]

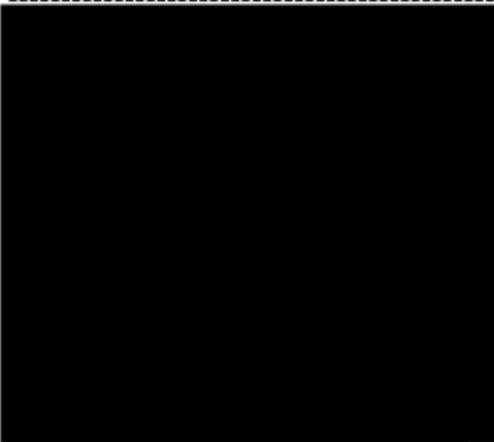

[REDACTED] There are about 6 other residential buildings that are interested and in the beginning stages of setting up or waiting for last approvals from the board. Have also just been contacted by [REDACTED] with an interest in using my company as a preferred vendor. I have 6 licensed massage therapists who I am getting great responses from and have been really reliable and professional.

I am finding some success in finding locations to set up shop but it isn't working. Feedback tells me that the concept is a good idea, to kind of create personal spas in high end residential buildings, and some buildings have been willing to take on the expenses of the table, linens, etc. But it has been a lot of work and has not shown financial reward. Either the feedback is wrong and I have taken another one of my bad ideas too far, or else I am not implementing it properly. I feel like if there is high quality massage services available in a residential building of 400+ multimillion dollar units it should be generating business. If I were to get my massage license and was able to take on the clients it has been able to build up I would have a really strong private practice and may have some extra business for my other therapists. I can't decide if I should be putting this company on the back burner and getting my own license or if I should continue working on it until I do figure out how to generate business in these buildings.

Another idea that seems most appealing right now is sending my resume out to luxury resorts abroad. I have have a [REDACTED] certification and also a certification to teach [REDACTED] with a fair amount of experience in both over the past couple of years. My asking to go to the school in [REDACTED] is because I have heard that it is liked by these types of jobs. and this option seems a million times better than absolutely anything else I can think of.

I feel like I need your advice more than anyone else's and really wish you were here. If you have suggestions of what the smartest thing to do at this point would be please send them my way!!!
