I would really like to be my own woman in terms of financial success. I have some solid [REDACTED] ideas but those make no money. I can write one or two [REDACTED] but those also make no money. I have an idea for a cool business that has been brewing for 10 years but not sure it would work - seems foolish to drop everything for a silly idea.

I currently [REDACTED]

I've got a small skill set. I have managed to do ok and am proud that I have completely earned everything. No fakeness or games.

Now I feel like I've got some karma in the bank and I want to do good things. Big big good things. Id like to be the first woman to do "X" in a way that I can be very wealthy and put money to work in smart ways. I know a few things I could do right now if I had my own money, stuff that would matter and generate more money and [REDACTED]

I thought when I turned 35 I would run out of ideas or that [REDACTED] would pass me up and I would not understand it. Instead, I feel like I have powerful ideas and the experience to know what will work and what is interesting.

[REDACTED]) I feel like I shouldn't be someone's dependent. I try to save everything else. I have 250K in my 401k and 150K in savings. I own half of two properties with [REDACTED]. Lease my car (short attention span). I like watches so every few years I buy one.

Does that help?

He wants me to be there when he meets you but I've told him he should go spend some time with you solo. You'd have fun!

I need career advice. Can I call you on the 30th? Will meet with Bill on Dec 10. Big re-org at [REDACTED]

[REDACTED]. My guess is that he'll go for ceo next and be iconic in his own way, like a nerdier and more customer focused Steve Jobs. Of course I want to support him which means finding something Seattle based but super flexible. I feel like I have 3 to 5 years of creativity left. My brain isn't yet ready to pack it in. Plus I look DAMN GOOD (haha). I can always try to make it work at [REDACTED] feel really out of place. Im struggling.
