Tell them it's not who you know or what you know , it's who you blow. See if they find it amusing?

Your phone interview with Gotham is next Monday at 11:00. These are the questions they plan to ask. They offered for you to answer them first via email and elaborate via phone if you like or you can just do them entirely via phone. Let me know what you prefer. I will also send a copy of these up in hardcopy.

1. As it relates to your career and your own aspirations what does 'power' mean to you?
2. Power or influence? Do they mean different things for you? If so, why?
3. Is it tougher now to climb the career ladder in your field than it was when you started out? If so, why? Is it tougher to do so in New York?
4. What is the greatest advantage for being in NYC for the type of work you do? Greatest challenge? How have you dealt with them over time?
5. Describe your toughest career challenge and how you dealt with it.
6. Greatest success/achievement to date —and why?

7. It has been said that power or influence today is all about engagement. In order to achieve meaningful impact, leaders must connect with a diverse array of stakeholders to build community, and form unconventional partnerships before ideas can turn into action. Do you agree? And if so, how are you are navigating these new power/influence rules?

9. What's the biggest challenge in your field for the next five years? How does being in New York help or hurt that?

10. Is it harder for women to achieve a work-life balance in New York?

11. How would you assess the future for NYC women in your industry?

12. What's your best advice for success, particularly as it pertains to working in NYC.
