Jeff -

After I wrote you yesterday I started thinking more and more about your case not knowing whether [REDACTED] is back from Australia or not.

I assume your legal team is in contact with Prince Andrew's legal counsel. As such, his counsel or more realistically he and/or his family, should have great relations through their intelligence service with those in Australia. If they chose to use those services I am sure they could develop a great deal of information about [REDACTED] and her boyfriend/husband when and while they live/lived there. Hopefully Andrew's counsel would share that with your team as it would be in his best interest to get this case resolved quickly. His (Andrew's) counsel could also request all of her various telephone records dating back to 2005/6 forward; names of associates; names of employers; family members (husband's); names of neighbors where they lived; etc. With this information you could hire someone in Australia to (discreetly) make inquiries as to her [REDACTED] reputation for truth and veracity - which to me in this case is paramount to almost the entire case.

Again, this is just some further thought on some investigative tasks that could be undertaken. An old friend of mine (Roy Black) taught me a long time ago there is never too much information that can be learned.
