new york is in a long recession, the economic booms are gone here, due to urbanization. in 5 years it will be better. it makes little sense to try to grow a garden in the most difficult place. little water, no fertilizer, bad weather. yes, it is sunny, but farms are closing down all over. asia, europe, san fran. are fertile ground, especially asia. no one [REDACTED]. everyone needs [REDACTED]. most people can't go due to family restrictions, kids in school, wife job. go.

Well, the truth is I watched you manipulate people with great success for years so I am sensitive to simulated empathy, fake reasons and hypothetical rewards. I recognize your patterns and something tells me not to follow this one. Your responses sound like relocating is in your interest more than mine, and that is my honest answer. I have many opportunities and leads here and you haven't asked me one question about my goals and options. Can you promise me I'm wrong or would you prefer to smile, take credit for a nice try and give the best advice another thought?

i tried both numbers. you need to get out of the house. get a job, it will teach you about business budgets. new york is not the place to learn, this is my best business advice, your sex life is your own business. you have done extremely well in learning to fly. no one has disputed that. i have been praiseful of that. it has little to do with real life and a business... i have no intention to leave, is exactly the same as i have no intention of following your advice. so why continue to ask.?
