Well, yes.

I went with one of the cross country guys I flew with at school. He was delivering the plane to someone who just bought it and offered me to fly from right seat and log a lot of flight time for free in a day. The plane was just old and even though it just came out of maintenance where we picked it up, the alternator malfunctioned and quit on the last leg. That means a full electrical failure and unlike the G2 there is no backup for anything. It does not affect the engine so it flew fine, everything just went black.

Im back home now, going to sleep. I will tell Larry everything later.

We had an alternator failure, lost all radios, lights, weather was ifr, had to shoot an ils with a portable garmin flying from the right seat, in the dark ,i couldn't turn on any runway lights on the frequency since the radios were dead, tower was closed, didnt make it the first time and had to go missed and come in again..
