Jeffrey,

I understood that -- not being severely retarded. :-)

I was trying to point out that the OTHER proposal -- not in innovation but on behavioral neuroscience -- which I re-attached to my previous message has no such paragraph and -- to me at least -- seems ALL about research.

Please look at THAT second proposal on Behavioral Neuroscience.

Thanks, Ellis

The Institute will foster an ecosystem of innovation, where new ideas can be immediately put into practice through the Academy's existing suite of programs, including conferences, workshops, education programs, entrepreneurship training, academic and lay publications, policy whitepapers, open-innovation challenges, awards, and grants.

Ideas and recommendations from the Institute will be rapidly mobilized into action through the fertile testing ground of the Academy's suite of scientific and educational programming, including initiatives like Frontiers of Science, our vibrant platform for scientific exchange and networking among thought leaders working at the forefront of interdisciplinary science; Scientists Without Borders, an open innovation platform devoted to fostering the generation of solutions to global challenges; and our education and career mentoring scientific pipeline programs, Science Alliance and the K-12 STEM Education Initiative.

Dear Jeffrey,

Our team is planning to discuss your remarks made to Larry to see if we can understand and profit from them. But in the meantime, I must say that I wonder how the Behavioral Neuroscience Institute proposal could be described as containing 'Lots of "education".'

If you wish to help us understand what Templeton would want, please let me know where they would see "education" in the attached proposal.

Thanks, Ellis
