Here's the report for the Rockefeller Foundation. Went to printers last night and I present to the Board next Friday. Not optimistic they will move ahead with anything in science mostly because they have moved into a space where they can "advocate" for huge issues and things like poverty, justice, inequality etc. Things that are never controversial and always have a media win. Not many out there really willing to go too deep.

The Rockefeller board contains no scientists and therefore the report was written for a more general audience - mostly to try to inspire. Earlier versions were very technical and sent back requesting a more engaging tone accessible to lay-people. Of course there are a zillion more areas but I thought a small sample of exciting new science might help the board get a sense for what types of innovation(s) could be applied across their various program areas.

Hope you like it!
