He likes the proposal I made. Some question about the mechanics since technically the grants expired when you ceased to be an employee, and they cannot resuscitate them under the terms of the company's stock program without shareholder approval. (They can extend an existing grant with Board approval, rather than shareholder approval, before an employee leaves, but once an employee leaves the grant is extinguished, which puts them in a different place.) There is a straightforward solution to this, and they are comfortable with paying you in cash the value of each of the relevant stock grant vests on the dates that they vest. Because the payment will be made in cash rather than stock, they can avoid the limitations in the stock plan, even though the amount of the cash payment will be determined by the value of the stock vest.

The only issue is that under Microsoft's retirement policy, an employee who has worked at the company for at least 15 years and who retires after age 55 will receive the vests of all grants that issued more than 12 months before the employee's separation date. So this would pick up all the grants through 2011 but not the grant in 2012.

I told him we need that to made up in cash.

Jay
