Eventually John wants to be the GM-owner of a resort hotel that included something like gambling, golf, recreation activities, conventions, etc. As a result, his dream job now would be a management trainee program in which he could rotate through several parts of the operation, like front desk-guest services, accounting, sales, banquets-conventions, entertainment, etc. The local Ritz Carlton (now Eau Resort) offers this type of management trainee program but it is very limited and apparently takes participants from existing employees. Of course, he is willing to take the advice of someone who knows the business as to the best way to start his career path.

Happy Independence Day. Paul says to tell you Hi, so Hi.

John is very interested. He loved Las Vegas when we were there over Christmas. I think he feels a bit intimidated, especially after his interview with The Breakers did not end up in a job. How do we proceed? Also, did you once mention you know the people associated with Atlantis in the Bahamas? Also, what about Hyatt? Where he can get the best start is where he should go. He knows he is entry-level and is a hard worker and fast learner.

I'll tell him when I get home tonight. We just got back from Roatan, an island off Honduras, from a week's dive vacation and he got 20 scuba dives in. Now he wants to run a resort in an exotic location. I told him to get to work in a hotel with activity attached (Golf, gambling, conventions etc.) gain experience in all aspects of the industry and it is possible. Ah, to be 22 again and convinced everything is not only possible, but going to happen!

Tom Kenan, who owns The Breakers, encouraged John to apply for a job there, but John has had only one interview for a position he was ill suited for, so he is looking for a management trainee position in the hospitality industry. Know anyone he can contact about a job?

How goes everything?
