The basic rule of Wikipedia is references. They can't write anything that isn't linked to a citation and if there are conflicting media sources, we can argue in the discussion section. If you have articles that refute claims or positive articles, we can use them to work on the article. I haven't really scoured the public citations, but a first level clean up would be to cite/quote and link to positive articles.

The second order would be to have positive articles written.

The main thing is that Wikipedia, when it is being rigorous, is really just a summary of main stream media articles and public documents so cleaning up requires a foundation of non-Wikipedia stuff.

This may be something to talk about in person, but it seems like you might have someone actively going after you, or you did. Have you neutralized that?
