couldn't agree more. no aggressive strategies, would be vastly counterproductive. I would wait on creating new silos until you had input from a donor group, so they feel part of the decision process. just setting it up appropriately so that you can accept bequests on death (without bells and whistles) would be a huge benefit to both .

It was a good discussion.

We have a meeting where they recommend how things should work on 4/29 which is right after I come back from 2 weeks of Spring break.

They are looking at how to structure things. Ideally we wouldn't get involved in a deep way in the tax related issues – even aggressive positions being taking on valuation.

We are basically promising that the silos will be well run. We discussed that we might add a few silos in areas we don't work in like Cancer research or International Education where we would pick someone else and make sure they do a super job. That way the big thematic areas (not religion or culture) that help with equity would mostly be covered.
