That is great. Thank you. My first step is to get accepted. I will start preparing for the application. They require somewhat solid programming experience.

However, I might not be accepted because I'm not eligible to work officially. As I understand "hackreactor" (organization that provides programming class) wants their students to find jobs right after because the companies pay "hackreactor" some fees. I will have to tell them that I'm interested in a job, so hopefully that will work.

I will update you when I know if I'm accepted or not. Thank you again.

My phone number is [REDACTED]. I'll be traveling alone (I'm attending national bridge tournament in Providence).

Regarding the project: it is currently on hold because my husband got full time job to pay the bills. He is not motivated enough to work after his work. I've been learning some programming on my own but the process is too slow. I was thinking to take an immersive programming class (<http://www.hackreactor.com/>) but I can't afford it now. So, the project is not moving but I'm not giving up and will make it happen. I think, if I get better at programming I can motivate my husband to to work with me.

We could talk more about the project and figure out if and how you can help.

If those days good, I will go ahead and by plane tickets. I will not need the car, I will take a train.

Thank you for your willingness to help. I appreciate it.

Hi Jeffrey,

I just want to give you an update.

I haven't find any non-for profit that will accept money for bridge project. We are working on the project but progress is slow.

I'm still working with a lawyer and I hope we will have some answer regarding my situation (if I'm staying in US or have to go back to Russia) in 5-6 months.

I might be in NYC at the end of November or beginning of December if I can find a place to stay.

Thank you again for the gift that you made last year.
