the quick summary is the following:

we told you how the idea is to build a protocol where you can transact in any possible asset class/currencies. But then this morning I realized something which is instead of just transacting in already existing currencies/assets we can go one step further meaning we can create them.

so the case in point is that I read somewhere that people transacting in Iron are thinking about creating their own currency just for that type of transaction (the reasons are interesting but maybe another time). But that's a lot of work for them, cause they need to create the currency and then the network to accept the transaction etc etc.

Whereas what we do is essentially a webpage where a company can go and create its own currency with its own rules "IronCurrency can only be used by this list of users in the network and its pegged to the dollar etc etc". What we do then is to create the new currency for them and add it to our network and they are ready to go in essentially no time.

Maybe I'm overly excited but I think it's a great idea because you essentially allow people to create their own currency with the click of a button and start using it in zero time.

What do you think?
