I was thinking they would be best off in Tokyo all things considered.

Was going to talk to the Monex folks (do you know them through Joi?) as they just bought a distressed exchange for 35M.

Hah -- my bad. I thought it was an odd question.

I think they are willing to do anywhere -- it would be best if it were somewhere they can get a lot of big volume or institutions

Miqs.io is the company that is building it with a couple MIT alums.

They previously contracted for CBOE to build one of their new exchange platforms.

Good would mean secure, good risk control, coin custody, and high performance. I'm learning more about what they built (they have 15 engineers working on it) before I would assert they're doing a good job.

They basically need to hire or partner with a good operator to help them launch. Jing (the CEO of Miqs) knows how to run an engineering consultancy but not an exchange. I think if we can help them do that and get banked, it will be profitable.

Hey,

I have a company I'm talking to who has built a new cryptocurrency exchange.

I still need to due diligence what they've built, but one of their core needs is that they are struggling to get banking/licensure in a good jurisdiction.

Is that something you'd be able to help with, were we to invest in them?

If their tech is good, and we can get them launched, it could be lucrative.

Best,

Jeremy
