Ok, thank you,

I just spoke with Sergey on the phone and he said neither Dasha nor Kristina had papers with them and he needs to see it in order to come up with the strategy for each individually. He said Dasha will do very well at the interview because of her poise but she got a pretty messed up situation because of notorious "one size fits all" strategy that travel agencies implement. With that said, he will come up with solutions and then say how much/how long it'll take and you'll decide. Without papers, he can't do/assess anything. Dasha will bring hers asap because she's in Kiev, Kristina's are in the embassy of Poland hence the delay. Sergey is a government official and diplomat, not a travel agent so he comes up with every strategy individually. Now it's become even more difficult because we're in the middle of the election but we'll figure it out.

He also said that there is one quite expensive option for a visa but you probably might consider that if there's someone whose presence in the US is of high importance. I can tell on the phone more.

Please understand that because it is in our culture, things happen slower, and when dealing with people that have power/authority it's especially slow.

Thank you so much for the wire, I'm sending him money asap and he said he'll give me the access to what they have as of now, they will use the money to scout in regions and can provide all the necessary papers of the contest if you so request.

Hugs

Hi Jeffrey! My friend in Europe has access to privately owned art for sale and wants me as an agent in the deals if I find buyers, are you interested to look at what they have? They have all the expertise and papers. There're Picasso, Da Vinci and Chirico for sale. I also wanted to ask for your advice if I end up finding the buyer how do I organize everything right and make sure I get the commission etc.?

Thank you.
