(Humanity Plus' single freelance employee usually takes long to respond.)

>>> PS Your eye contact hypothesis is very interesting. I suspect that what is going on might not be related to sight, but to attention. There may be a special brain circuit that forms a feedback loop with another person, so you don't just read their expression, but check their expression change upon them reading you. In other words, eye contact is possibly not about looking, but communication. (Once that circuit is trained well, one can also infer a lot more by looking at the eye region than I can see in it.)
