Understood, Jeffrey. No panic. Please note my previous text about the general ignorance, even with sophisticated real estate experts, of the extent AND MOMENTUM of the Detroit downtown renaissance. It is a small submarket, with only about 100,000 people working there, but it is growing strongly with high tech, engineering, financial services, government and manufacturer head offices leading the pack. If you think it might be of use, I would be happy to chat with some of your real estate expert folks. Thanks for following up, Jeffrey!

The parking situation in the downtown is interesting. A number of the 22 MM sf of office buildings were built many decades ago with limited or NO parking. As a result, there is a chronic parking shortage downtown as many surface lots, over the decades, have been converted to other uses. Parking rates are still relatively low at $200/$250 per month for a "floating"/"reserved" stall respectively, but these rates are more than double of several years ago. Because of the general market undersupply there is continued strong upward pressure on rates.

The Buhl comes with a 8 level parking structure next door, giving it a real advantage over its competition. Moreover, existing Buhl tenant rates in the garage average less than 60% of current market rates, giving us additional major net operating income increases as leases roll over. Also hourly and daily rates keep jumping. Half of this asset's NOI comes from its parking structure, another very positive aspect of this deal. The parking situation downtown is so tight that Gilbert is having to shuttle in some of his tenants from surface lots several miles away!
