Jeffrey -

Per your request, posting you today on your non-agency RMBS positions. We are including indicative levels/context from the DB traders (compared to Bloomberg's levels, which is where the positions mark from pure data feeds, vs. real bids). Harry and I talked about the drop in payment on your GS B1. The concern was that the B3 subordinate to your own B1 tranche had stopped paying, and your payments on the B1 were affected/reduced (Monthly principal payments on the B1 tranche dropped 85% month-over-month. You collected $5,880.98 in interest, $407.99 in principal for Jan). You can see the trader's comments directly below -- the view being that the pipeline of underlying loans should recover from temporary gaps in payments. Our DB RMBS traders noted that the underlying collateral of your positions is relatively clean, seasoned (2003-05) and should recoup somewhat from current levels. That said, most of the tranches you own will be subject to some degree of losses. On your GS, for example, our traders note that there's 5% of credit enhancements on your B1s and ~9% of delinquency on the underlying pool.

I'm not certain on your impetus for buying these over the spring (please post us if there's color we should know on your original investment thesis). We don't believe you need to sell into this, but we wanted you to have the update on the levels and affected payments.

I took a deeper dive into this. And it looks like all hope is not lost. It may enter a period of little or no principal/interest, but keep holding it. The model I'm looking at forecasts payments to resume in the future. It's quite a thick tranche vs the size of the serious delinquency pipeline, and could be worth quite a bit still. Looking solely at the Bloomberg historical cashflow tables can sometimes be misleading. Call me if you'd like to discuss.

Thanks,

Brian Clark
