This week's projects promise pop spectacle, crying in public, and adventures going Nowhere.

Polyphonic Spree's Next Studio Album, Live Album & DVD

by The Polyphonic Spree

 Category Indie Rock

 Location Dallas, TX

Larger than life

When your artistic vision involves twenty-odd musicians, an orchestra's worth of instruments, and a trunk of flowing robes, just playing a single gig feels like a triumph. With infectious glee, The Polyphonic Spree have lived this vision for more than a decade — defying the odds to remain supersized. Now, the band is turning to fans for its upcoming work: a new studio album, tour documentary, and accompanying live record. Sometimes, more is more.

Nowhere Magazine

by Porter Fox

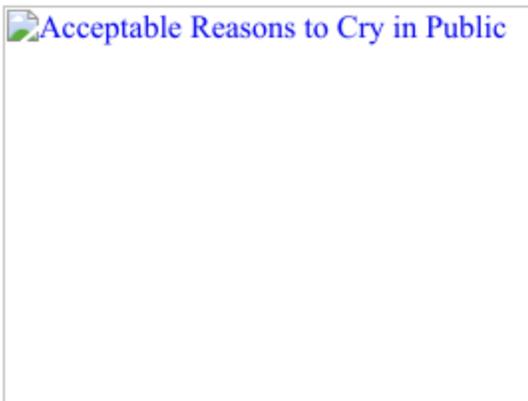

Category Publishing

Location Brooklyn, NY

Have words, will travel

Nowhere is a digital travel magazine that publishes dispatches from ancient sea crossings, rural farms, and remote islands alike. Each adventure is illustrated by an array of found objects, field notes, and other interactive explorer's ephemera, resulting in a thrilling narrative that can whisk readers away to just about any destination. Now, with the magazine's more portable tablet edition, we can finally bring Nowhere everywhere.

Acceptable Reasons to Cry in Public

by a girl in salt lake city

Category Public Art

Location Salt Lake City, UT

Cry me a river

Sidewalks. Gas stations. Benches. According to the artists behind Acceptable Reasons to Cry in Public, these are all perfectly good places for a public breakdown. (We've been there.) The tone may be tongue-in-cheek, but the mission of its creators is in earnest — they'll print the manifesto as a series of broadside posters, and encourage backers to exhibit them in public places. Just the thought is making us misty.
